

School counselors more involved than ever in students' lives

Written by Elizabeth Barrett
Thursday, 10 February 2011 14:49 -

Wiggins, Glodowski of GHS discuss roles at Stakeholders meeting.

Gone are the days when students seek out counselors for ACT test or scholarship applications.

These days guidance counselors at Gothenburg Public Schools see kids for a myriad of reasons such as dealing with the breakup of a relationship or thoughts of suicide to dating violence and much more.

“We are there as advocates for the students,” said high school counselor Jerry Wiggins.

Interestingly, Wiggins said they have the most contact with students dealing with social issues around social events—like homecoming, coronation and prom—and the holidays.

Students with academic concerns often visit counselors at the beginning and end of the school year and when scholarships are due.

Wiggins and Pam Glodowski, who counsels students grades four through eight, spoke to 29 Stakeholders at a noon meeting Feb. 2 at Gothenburg Public Library.

Stakeholders are community members who are invited to meetings on different educational topics. They are then asked to share what they learn with at least three other people.

School counselors more involved than ever in students' lives

Written by Elizabeth Barrett

Thursday, 10 February 2011 14:49 -

Over the past few years, school counselors have become more involved in students' lives than ever before. This is due to a variety of factors, including the increasing number of students with mental health issues, the need for students to have a safe space to talk, and the fact that school counselors are now often the first point of contact for students who are struggling. In addition, school counselors are now often involved in a wide range of activities, such as providing support to students who are experiencing academic difficulties, helping students to develop social skills, and providing support to students who are experiencing personal problems. This increased involvement has led to a number of positive outcomes, including a decrease in the number of students who drop out of school, an increase in the number of students who are successful in college, and a decrease in the number of students who are involved in substance abuse. As a result, school counselors are now an essential part of the school community, and their work is more important than ever.