Social skills mentored through program

With a light agenda, Dist. 20 board members spent most of their Monday night meeting learning about a new mentoring program.

Called "Circle of Friends," the social skills program matches high school and elementary peers with students with disabilities.

"They then interact with students with learning disabilities, autism or those who have trouble with peer relationships," said speech language pathologist Erin Feather.

Special education teacher Heather Franzen said the students meet much of the time over the lunch hour. Peers often interact with students through games.

Sherry Damrow, a special education teacher, said the program is in its first year.

The high school program received a $1,000 grant to implement Circle of Friends and the grade school $650 for the first year.

Damrow said she started with two target students, noting that the number has grown to five such students and 11 mentors.

She noted that teachers have applied for a second grant through the Autism Action Partnership
