

Snakes alive

Written by Elizabeth Barrett

Saturday, 29 August 2009 21:05 - Last Updated Saturday, 29 August 2009 21:23

It all started last week when a work colleague told of her sighting of a rattlesnake.

She even provided a cell-phone photograph of the eight-rattle viper without its head after it was whacked off with a shovel.

Another day, I heard a story about two ranchers who discovered a large rattler in a pasture and ran over it with a pickup.

That was followed by one more story about a small boy who received anti-venom treatments after he was bitten by an adolescent rattler during play.

Needless to say, my thoughts turned to rattlesnakes last Saturday morning as I slipped on my running shoes for a run along a cow path near Jeffrey Lake I've used for years.

A rattler could be lurking under every yucca plant I passed or stretched across my way when I crested a hill.

Our daughter Betsy, who loves anything that zigzags through the grass, suggested I take my cell phone if I was worried.

"What would you do if I called?" I asked.

"I'd jump on the jet ski and come find you. Then I'd kill a cow, cut out its heart and put it where the snake bit you—to draw out the poison," she explained with the slightest hint of sarcasm.

Snakes alive

Written by Elizabeth Barrett

Saturday, 29 August 2009 21:05 - Last Updated Saturday, 29 August 2009 21:23

“Then I’d call a helicopter to come get you. Haven’t you always wanted to ride in a helicopter?”

“I have ridden in a helicopter,” I told her, a bit disappointed she wasn’t buying into my irrational fear.

Without her sympathy, the dog and I started off—my radar on high alert for any rattling noises in the grass.

Halfway into the run, I realized I hadn’t heard anything unnerving along the way.

It was then I noticed snow on the mountain, a rugged prairie plant flowering on the side of a hill, and a delicate spider’s web laced between two stalks of buffalo grass that sparkled with dew.

“This is living in the moment,” I told myself, realizing I’d abandoned whatever deep-seated fear—driven by something which had nothing to do with rattlesnakes—that had taken me away from living life.

Ann Wilson Schaef writes that fear is a signal that we have abandoned the gods that protect and guide us. Fear also takes us away from living in the moment.

“You’re back,” Betsy said with a smug smile upon my return.

“Yes,” I replied. “I’m back.”